Just Say No to Truck Beds

According to American Humane, more than 100,000 dogs die every year from accidents that results from riding in a truck bed, The Epoch Times reported.

Here is why you shouldn't let your canine companion ride there, leashed or unleashed:

- They may be tempted to jump out.
- High winds can launch grit, small pebbles, bugs, and the like into your dog's eyes, nasal passage, or windpipe, and the sun can overheat the temperature of the bed.
- It's dangerous to secure your dog there with a leash, because he may be bumped out of the bed altogether; likewise, cages or crates are not safe if an accident involving a roll-over occurs.
- Finally, it's scary back there with gusts of wind and loud noises.

"The only way to keep your dog truly safe is to keep him inside the vehicle. And if there's no space for your buddy up front, then leave him at home. The risk isn't worth it," the article said.

On a Leash, Keep your Dog within 6 Feet of you.

Krista Magnifica, owns a small-animal veterinary hospital in Jarrettsville, MD., and developed PAWBLY.COM, a pet health website.

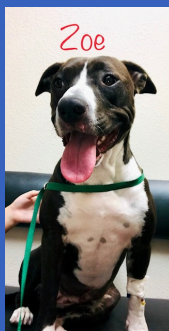

I hate retractable Leashes. They're dangerous, I've seen them do terrible damage to my clients – lacerating their hands, wrapping around their legs, making them trip and fall. They're not safe for dogs, either – I've seen dogs on them who've been hit by cars. Your dog belong within 6 feet of you at all times when outside.
